There are a number of factors that have contributed to this change. One is the rise of social media. Social media has created a new space for teens to connect with each other and share their experiences. This has helped to break down the barriers between different groups of teens and create a more inclusive environment.

Another factor that has contributed to the decline in teen rebellion is the internet. The internet has given teens access to a vast amount of information and resources. This has helped them to become more informed about the world and to understand different perspectives. As a result, they are less likely to be swayed by extremist ideologies.

Finally, the changing nature of parenting has also played a role in the decline of teen rebellion. Today's parents are more likely to be involved in their children's lives and to provide them with support and guidance. This has helped to create a more positive and stable home environment, which has reduced the likelihood of teens rebelling.

The decline in teen rebellion is a positive trend. It suggests that today's teens are more tolerant and understanding than previous generations. This is good news for the future, as it means that we can expect a more peaceful and just society.

Here are some tips for parents who want to raise less rebellious, more tolerant children:

- Be involved in your children's lives. Talk to them about their day, their friends, and their interests. Let them know that you are there for them and that you support them.
- Provide your children with a safe and stable home environment. This means creating a home where your children feel loved, respected, and safe.
- Encourage your children to be open-minded and tolerant of others. Talk to them about different cultures, religions, and lifestyles. Help them to understand that there is more than one way to live.

- Set a good example for your children. Be respectful of others, even if you don't agree with them. Show your children that it is possible to disagree with someone without being disagreeable.

Raising less rebellious, more tolerant children is not always easy, but it is possible. By following these tips, you can help your children to grow up to be happy, healthy, and productive members of society.
